CYBERBULLYING TAKING PLACE AMONG YOUNGER CHILDREN

There are risks to having a smartphone. In a recent survey, more than half of fifth grade students had smartphones. And with smartphones, kids may become victims of cyberbullying or become a cyberbully. In the survey, 18 percent of those with smartphones reported that they had been cyberbullies.

Researchers asked kids if anyone online had said or done anything that was very cruel and that really hurt or bothered them. The number of children who were bullied went down from the third to the fifth grade. As kids develop, more of them know who their tormenters are. And the incidents of repeated bullying goes down. However, the number of kids who were bullied and were also bullies rose from 15 percent in the third grade to 21 percent in the fifth grade.

More and more children report bullying; the number of reports is rising. Educators think this may be because programs to report bullying are working. They believe programs to prevent bullying, which include reporting it, are helping. The percentage of kids who know what bullying is, is going up.

A new approach to teaching children how to behave is developing. It is called social-emotional learning (SEL). In SEL, kids learn how to detect and manage their own emotions and they also learn how to make good decisions. Schools are including it in their curriculums as they are one of the primary places where students learn social and emotional skills. The program gives kids courage and skills in the online world. Reporting bad behavior and helping those who need help is part of the SEL program.

First thing for parents: talk to your kids about the subject of bullying and look for signs. As a parent, you have a direct influence on your child's social behavior. It's never too late for parents to teach moral values and ethical behavior to their kids. Children should feel safe and loved in their home, and there should always be communication between parents and their children.
